ABSTRACT

The size and volume of the Indian retail sector have both expanded over the course of the past two decades. It is among the economic subfields that is expanding at the quickest rate. There has been a discernible shift in the behavior of customers as a direct consequence of the transition from disorganized to organized commerce. Now, the consumer is interested in purchasing a single item from a number of different brands, and the prospect of having all of those brands conveniently located in one location excites him. Because of the shifting behaviors of their clients, merchants are being forced to come up with novel approaches to the distribution of various types of value to their clientele. The purpose of this article is to investigate the impact that different marketing methods have on the level of pleasure experienced by retail customers. The data collecting tools consisted of structured questions and scenarios, and they were administered to a total of 150 respondents in Bangalore, which is one of the cities in the National Capital Region. In order to conduct an analysis of the data and provide an interpretation of its meaning, descriptive statistics such as percentage analysis, the weighted average, and the chi-square test were utilized. According to the findings of this study, the organized retailing sector places a significant emphasis on its products, services, promotional activities, and sales employees.

1. INTRODUCTION

When considering the economic and employment impact of India's various sectors, the retail sector stands out as the clear winner. The retail sector in India has emerged as one of the most dynamic and rapid-fire sectors, with numerous new entrants to the market. Unfortunately, none of them have been profitable thus far since they lack the resources to make the first expenditures necessary to compete with established businesses. The retail sector in India is slowly but surely on the cusp of becoming the next big thing. Indian consumers' purchasing habits and the shopping experience as a whole have seen dramatic shifts in recent years, ushering in a new era of retail innovation. India's retail sector has been transformed by the introduction of modern retailing, as evidenced by the proliferation of malls, shopping centers, and mega-complexes that house restaurants, movie theatres, and other services under one roof. The growth of the organized retail sector in India will be driven by several factors, including the country's young and growing labor force (the median age is 24 years), the rise of nuclear families in urban areas, the rise of the workingwomen population, and new opportunities in the services sector. What we call "consumer behavior" is the study of how people think and act before, during, and after they buy and use a product or service. Researching consumer behavior entails asking questions such "when do individuals buy?" "what do they buy?" "why do they buy it?" and other similar inquiries. It combines concepts and methods from economics, anthropology, sociology, sociopsychology, and psychology. Family, friends, and other social networks, as well as the larger societal context, are all considered in an effort to gauge the extent to which each individual consumer is influenced by each. There are two sides to consumer behavior: the obvious action of making a purchase, which can be observed by anybody, and the less obvious decision-making process, which may involve the interaction of a number of complicated variables. With the rise of the nuclear family and an overall rise in educational attainment, more and more people are making their way to modern retail outlets to acquire their day-to-day requirements. When goods and services are sold or rented to final customers for use in the home, this is known as retailing. To be successful in retail, marketers must have a thorough awareness of customers' buying habits, which includes knowing when, where, and what customers buy. To make a sound business decision, the retailer must take into account the decision variables listed here. The retailers develop the most effective combination to draw in their ideal clientele by responding to their wants and demands. It is important to consider how customers will react to the retail marketing mix because it will affect the company's long-term prospects. Retail customers evaluate each component of the marketing mix based on how it resonates with their own unique set of values, beliefs, knowledge, and experiences. Needs, motivations, perceptions, and attitudes, as well as family background, cultural norms, and economic status, all have a role in shaping a consumer's actions, both directly and indirectly. With this information, stores will be better able to align their retail marketing mix with their intended customer bases. The size and make-up of shopping have evolved over time. Indians have become much more savvy shoppers as a result of rising literacy rates, increased contact with the West through media like satellite TV and newspapers published in other countries.

In making purchases, quality is becoming increasingly important to consumers. Consequently, Indian shoppers now choose to make their purchases from more reputable establishments. Organize retail chains are a good example. The shopper is looking for a business that takes customer reviews seriously. The modern shopper values convenience above all else, and prefers finding a store where they can get everything they need in a single location. The demographic, psychological, and lifestyle characteristics of consumers might shed light on their shopping habits.

11. CONCLUSION

The current study investigates the complicated behavior, attitude, perception, and motivation of shoppers in Reliance Fresh at Faridabad. The findings indicate that the vast majority of the people who responded are housewives or females and have some level of education. The college going respondents are more captivated by the supermarket environment and purchase grocery not from Kirana stores but from formats like Reliance Fresh and eager to experiment with the newest technological breakthroughs. They are more interested in a wide selection of things offered at reasonable prices, a range of payment choices, the ability to serve themselves, and variety of brands. The location of the store, the availability of parking, the lighting, the music playing in the background, and the overall atmosphere of the store are all key variables that contribute to a satisfied client base. Customers are more likely to patronize establishments like Reliance Fresh as it offers timely services, which may include a variety of payment choices (cash, credit cards, and debit cards, for example), as well as error-free billing. The retail establishments' use of a variety of promotional strategies, including discounts, coupons, and loyalty cards, amongst others, is another crucial aspect that contributes significantly to the customer satisfaction. In light of the fact that the breadth of the study was focused on the issues of organized retail sector and easily visible that in order to remain profitable in the new economy, Reliance Fresh will need to devise a strategy that takes into account the increasing level of competition. As a result, it need to be aware of shifting consumer behaviors and should have an awareness of the potential directions that retail formats will go in the country.
